Lambda Legal staff and board worried about how to explain that our work wasn’t done—that everything we do: defending families, protecting LGBTQ kids, winning workplace fairness and more all still needed your support.

We don’t worry about that anymore.

We are facing our hardest fight since the beginning of the AIDS epidemic. Today, two branches of government are overtly hostile to LGBT people and everyone living with HIV. Federal agencies are trying to erase us from government data and Congress has a clear path to passing anti-gay, anti-trans legislation. Marriage equality is under attack in multiple states.

Since 1973, Lambda Legal has used the third branch—the Courts—to advance and defend our tiny minority. LGBT people are just five percent of the population and yet our movement of love and pride is so firmly rooted in the Constitution that we have won case after case.

The law—and the massive support of public opinion—is on our side. Our opponents are better funded than we are, and they have the government’s support.

That’s why Lambda Legal opened an office in Washington, D.C.: to add to our fight to stop, slow down and mitigate harm from the White House and Congress.

With over half a million supporters, a committed staff and board, and hundreds of volunteers, Lambda Legal is building. We are your lawyers and we will never back down.

BECAUSE OF YOU

WE DO THIS

BECAUSE OF YOU
In 2016, opponents of LGBT rights spread lies and hysteria about transgender people as restroom predators—when in fact, trans people are themselves the targets of harassment and violence. Lambda Legal was on the front lines, fighting back.

We sued for Juliet Evancho and Elissa Ridenour, who until last year went to the restroom at their suburban Pittsburgh high school like any other girls. Then an anti-LGBT group sowed panic among parents and the school board about the “bodily privacy” of other students. The board voted 5-4 to undo their affirming restroom practice, forcing trans girls like Juliet and Elissa through the peril of using the boys' room.

Juliet and Elissa began to avoid liquids and stopped going to the bathroom completely at school. Lambda Legal sued. This February, a federal judge ruled that the school’s actions were likely to be found unconstitutional if the case went to trial and ordered the school to allow Juliet and Elissa to use the girls’ restroom.

Lambda Legal has also been battling North Carolina’s anti-LGBT law since the week it went into effect. The law would have forced Joaquin Carcano, lead plaintiff in our case, to walk 15 minutes across campus just to use a restroom, or take the service elevator to a housekeeping area in the basement of his work building.

“This is about more than restrooms,” Carcano says. “This is about dignity, about respect.”

At the end of March, North Carolina said they had fixed the problem, but in reality, they didn’t. They simply passed a new law that doubles down on many of the worst parts of the old one: restroom policies can’t be enacted without the legislature’s okay, and cities and towns can’t pass laws protecting LGBT people until at least 2020.

With your help, Lambda Legal will beat back transphobes determined to keep LGBT people out of restrooms or any other public space. We’ll keep on suing.
Work is essential to our lives. It keeps roofs over our heads, feeds our loved ones and can give us purpose, dignity and identity. When someone cuts us off from our livelihoods because of something we don’t control—like our sexual orientation, our gender identity or our HIV status—it’s devastating and extremely personal.

Our client Kimberly Hively was spotted kissing her girlfriend in a parking lot at the college where she taught math.

Our client Jameka Evans was told she looked too masculine, and an HR manager asked her outright if she was a lesbian.

Both lost jobs in which they excelled. Lambda Legal went to court for both of them, and on behalf of all LGBT people in the workplace. In 2016, a court disagreed with our argument that expecting men and women to look and behave in stereotypical ways constitutes sex discrimination, and is thus illegal.

But in April 2017 we made history, compelling a federal appeals court to agree that it’s against civil rights law to fire people for being gay. The court agreed that sex discrimination includes LGBT discrimination.

LGBT people have long struggled under a patchy and unclear web of legal protections in the workplace. Together with your support, we’re changing the game. We intend once and for all to make it clearly illegal for colleagues and superiors to intimidate, threaten and terminate workers because of who they love and who they are.

LGBT discrimination is sex discrimination, and we’re winning in the courts because we make it clear that discrimination is unlawful.
